The release of Heath Ledger's final movie brings mixed emotions for Lily Cole, as David Murray reports from London

LILY Cole expected the biggest film role of her fledgling acting career to be challenging.

But the young model could not have anticipated the emotional roller coaster that The Imaginarium of Doctor Parnassus would bring.

Cole was in New York on a break in filming the fantasy-adventure movie when a friend called with news of Heath Ledger's death.

Initially, there was just shock, then sadness, and eventually questions about what would become of the 28-year-old Australian star's final film.

"Everybody was very spread out," Cole says from a London hotel suite, as the movie is miraculously prepared for release.

"We had this weird month to grieve and to also find out what would happen.

"We didn't know if the film was going to continue."

After director Terry Gilliam rescued the project, with Johnny Depp, Jude Law and Colin Farrell, it is now with mixed emotions that Cole greets the final product.

"I worked opposite him, but also that character, for so long that it's familiar again – 'there's Heath again' – there's something nice about it," she says.

"I also feel really proud, knowing how difficult it was, for everybody emotionally to finish it but also on a production level – the fact that Terry was able to do it. It was such a big kind of achievement that they managed to finish the film and that it does work."

Starring in a Gilliam film alongside Ledger (who plays a chameleon known only as Tony) and veteran actor Christopher Plummer (Dr Parnassus) was daunting for Cole, who made her name in fashion shoots and on the catwalk.

She had previously starred in the comedy St Trinian's, but playing the key role of Dr Parnassus's beautiful daughter Valentina was a step up and she admits to nerves.

The film has her travelling through London with a circus-style show, and becoming caught up in a centuries-old battle between her father and the devil (Tom Waits).

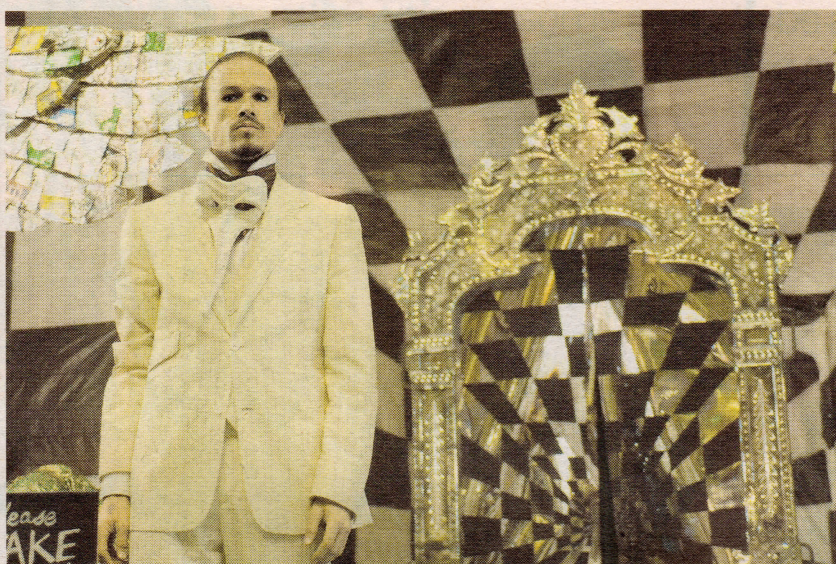

The trio of Law, Depp and Farrell fill in for Ledger in incomplete scenes in which he steps through a magic mirror into an imaginary world.

"I don't think it struck me until we did a read-through and I met with the other actors," she says.

"They're all such brilliant people and they're all so talented and so much more experienced than I was. It was really like, 'Oh my God, what am I going to have to perform against and be a part of?'"

Making it on to the London Sunday Times rich list last year with an estimated wealth of £6 million ($A10.5 million), Cole has the world at her feet at just 21 years.

Her good fortune started as a gangly 14-year-old schoolgirl, when a modelling talent scout spotted her when she was walking through London's Soho.

She had her big break in an Italian Vogue photoshoot a short time later and has since been a favourite of designers such as Chanel, Versace and Louis Vuitton.

She also appears to have her head firmly on her shoulders, studying art history at the prestigious Cambridge University.

However, it is her striking look that fits perfectly in Parnassus, and, for a novice, her solid performance only films I love, but I just love that he's so intelligent and creative as a personality and that he really doesn't compromise that when he makes his films."

In many respects Cole's twin professions are very similar, she says, with both "commercially driven and at the same time full of artists who are super imaginative".

"With a photographer ... you still have the costumes, the make-up, the hair, the clothes, the background, the visions.

"Or there's someone making a film, which is a longer commitment, which has new elements like characters and relationships and a story line, but it's still creating an image and a world."

Her high profile does have its drawbacks, such as media scrutiny, which was at its peak when she struck up a relationship with Jude Law last year.

Cole says she just tries to "stay as private as possible" and ignore any unwanted attention.

"Like, I don't know all the things that have been written about me and I wouldn't want to investigate them all."

She is now seeing Without a Trace actor Enrique Murciano, jetting between the US and the UK. When they first met she hadn't seen his TV show, and he didn't know she was acting.

"You fall in love because you do, and the career isn't really a part of that," she says.

"I have to do these interviews, make these photographs, be in unusual circumstances that he's very used to, so I'm sure it helps that way."

Whether her acting career takes off or not, Cole says she will not forget Ledger's time in her life and the help he gave her.

"He didn't patronise me with particular tips, rather he just gave me a voice coach ... and he was just really generous, not just to me but to everybody," she says.

"He knew I was intimidated to be new and to be in those circumstances. He was constantly trying to be supportive, to tell me when I'd done well."

"He'd be very present, even if the camera wasn't on him, just to constantly try and make the best work possible out of everybody."

The Imaginarium of Doctor Parnassus opens in cinemas on October 29.

will take some by surprise. She landed the part after being asked to audition for another movie, Sally Potter's Rage.

The casting director then recommended her to former Monty Python member Gilliam for the Parnassus project.

"I obviously knew of Monty Python - I'm English - but at the same time I was born in 1987 so I kind of missed the big wave of it," she says.

"I'd seen (Gilliam's) Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas and Brazil.

"You only have to watch one of Terry's films and you get this impression of this very unusual vision. I'm not saying his is the only way to make a film and his are the
